Our Mexican Correspondence.

City of Mexico, March 27, 1865.

Within a few weeks some startling rumors have been abroad in the capital—not only that several thousand Americans have arrived in Chihuahua with arms and ammunition for Juarez, but that a wide-spreading plan, extending all through the southern part of the confederacy, had been hatched up, by order of the government, for the invasion of Mexico. The secretiveness of the plot was all right, the detected Sherman still advancing through North Carolina, and that the President had been publicly inaugurated, but with "speech such as might be expected from a despot and ignoramus."

THE OUTBREAK IN PUEBLA.

I had last evening in my last number given a brief account of the outbreak in the important city of the Aztecs, scene of the Mexican Confederation, and containing some seven thousand inhabitants. The formidable outbreak originated in the discovery of infamous facts, causing a general outcry against the European troops quartered there, and even the English, who were only recently arrived, were much annoyed.
